

Command and Control

Making the right decisions at the right time

Command and Control is a management system used when crucial decisions have to be made against an unremitting timescale. The decisions require a high level of competence by key people working outside the normal day to day accepted style of management.

Identifying the personnel capable of effective command and control is a challenge in itself. Once team members are selected, they'll need to be taught the ability to command and control and practice it regularly.

Our Management Training Facility is the ideal environment in which to develop this ability by dealing with realistic scenarios in a controlled environment. Through innovative event simulation, delegates have numerous opportunities to develop their knowledge management, decision making and leadership skills in the most demanding and realistic of conditions.

Ultimately, delegates develop their skills by sharing information in an open and creative manner that is not normally associated with routine business activities.

Skills developed include:

- Listening, communication and decision making
- The ability to absorb information, analyse and communicate it, then implement action resulting from the leadership's decisions
- Prioritising activities in the command centre
- The ability to handle stress
